Best Practices for Online SIGs

1. Mailing list
Of course anyone would be welcome to join a SIG, but the Alumnae Association can generate a targeted invitation list to get the group up and running. These would be alumnae that identify themselves with the profession you're targeting for this group.

2. Introduce yourself
Start a discussion item asking people to introduce themselves as they join the group. People like to talk about themselves and this might lead to further connections within the group by people in similar geographic or professional areas, etc.

3. Introduce discussion items
This keeps the group active and hopefully people joining in. The discussion items could pertain to job openings, interesting articles, issues in the profession, etc.

4. Regional meet ups
If there is a large contingency of alums in the group in a specific area, perhaps suggest that someone organize a get-together so that people have face time.
5. Steering committee
Ask members to volunteer for the SIG steering committee. This committee can help take the load off of moderator, come up with discussion items, and be a group that could be tapped for a successor.

6. Student participants
It is up to each SIG as to whether it allows students to be members.
